- 3) You should not force quit apps on iOS to save battery performance - Click here for full article

John Gruber (a Tech blogger) writes:

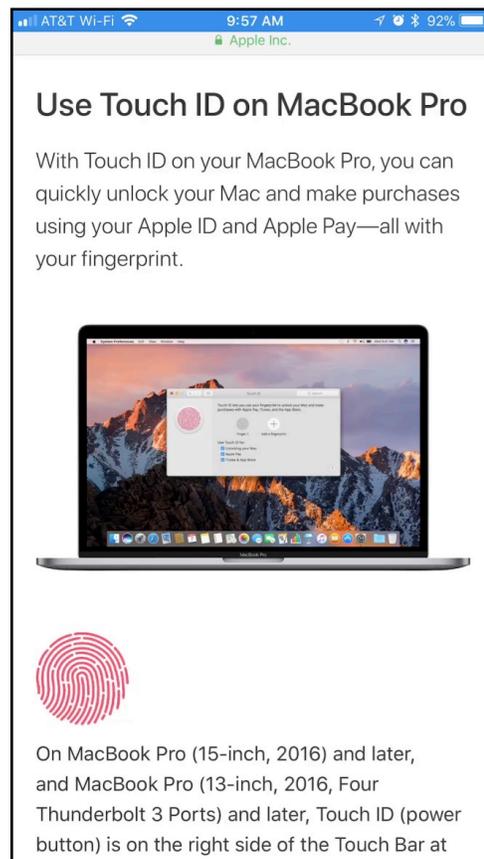

The mistaken idea is that the apps in the background are locking up unnecessary RAM and consuming unnecessary CPU cycles, thus hurting performance and wasting battery life.

The iOS system is designed so that none of the above justifications for force quitting are true. Apps in the background are effectively 'frozen', severely limiting what they can do in the background and freeing up the RAM they were using. iOS is really, really good at this. It is so good at this that unfreezing a frozen app takes up way less CPU (and energy) than relaunching an app that had been force quit. Not only does force quitting your apps not help, it actually hurts. Your battery life will be worse and it will take much longer to switch apps if you force quit apps in the background.

TIPS!

TIP - © 3D Touch Save or copy an image in Safari.

- Search for an image or open a webpage that has pictures
- © 3D Touch the image to get a preview
- Slide up to see available actions
- Tap to save or copy the image
- Here is an example:

TIP - Photos - Use burst mode to capture a moving subject

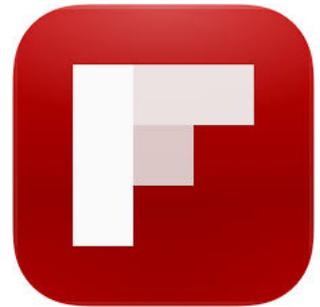

- Helpful if your hands are shaky or you can't adequately brace the iPhone.
- Good tutorial from the 'iPhone Photography School'
- Click here for the tutorial link:
- Burst mode automatically triggered when using the timer
- Select 1 or more favorites from the burst.
- Reviewing the burst on a larger screen is helpful.
